Dear Students Enrolled in HIST 585-001 for Fall 2013,

Recently, one of our faculty members, Prof. Crespino, was awarded a research grant from Emory’s University Research Committee and will not be teaching in the fall. Thus the fall 2013 course, HIST 585-001: 20th Century America will be cancelled soon on OPUS.

Please check OPUS as well as our fall 2013 graduate course atlas for other history classes that you may be interested in.

The department sincerely regrets this inconvenience.

Thank you for understanding,

Semester Description:

Politics and Society in Twentieth Century America

This course provides an introduction to the political and social historiography of twentieth century America. Since many of the students in the course will be first-time authors in relatively short order, weekly readings draw heavily from books that began as dissertations. The course has two main objectives: first, to help students orient themselves in the historiography of modern America in preparation for their qualifying examinations; and second, to think critically about the methods and approaches that historians have used to study modern America as a way of stimulating ideas about their own research.

Required Textbooks, Articles, and Resources:

TBA.

Grading:

Students will read, on average, a monograph and a journal article each week. They will be evaluated based on their participation in class discussions and their performance on a midterm paper and a final research paper.
